

Uh-oh.

Well, the Mythos cardigan has a few problems. I found out that I had managed to screw of the shaping of the right side when I knit it, so I tinked back and reknit that after I finished the left front. I was excited - I only had the back left side to finish.

Well, that is, til I realized that the entire right side of the sweater body is too long by 6 stitches. Argh. The sweater has been in time out for a couple of days. It was just too painful to think of ripping out, and I needed to consider my options. This is lace-weight yarn on size 3 needles. I've already reknit the front once. So, what are the options?

1. Do nothing. Not an attractive option - the grafting of the back will not work.
2. Increase 3 stitches on the left back that I have yet to knit, and add 3 stitches to the right side. The back will match, but what about the sides - they will be uneven.
3. Blocking. This is laceweight yarn, it will stretch, and this is only 6 stitches out of 90. This will help some. What else?
4. Seam "management". I can also ever-so-slightly pull up the seam to match the other side in length. This will make sure that the side are equal as well.
5. That leaves the front - which I'm hoping will just drape beautifully and show off the gorgeous colorway.

Any other ideas?

May the knitting force be with me as I go onward!
