

Really Bad at This

As some who read the blog might remember, I ~~whined~~ might have mentioned a ~~lot~~ a little about the fact that I had knit other people things for quite a while, including a couple of lovely sweaters, and I was going to be more selfish in my knitting because I was a teensy-weensy tired of knitting for other people. Now I did work on some lovely Diagonal Lace socks, that I am in fact wearing at this very moment, which is good. But, what's on my needles and in my just-finished project pile? Let's see:

First, a pair of socks knit out of some donated and stashed Lamb's Pride, with some sock yarn added to heels and toes:

Second, a pair of socks through Socks for Soldiers for a family friend headed to Iraq. This is the second foot for the second sock, because my attempt at sock surgery completely failed.

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

Third, a scarf for a friend - and it's very cushy and yummy. I'm about 45 inches, with 20 more inches to go.

It's going to be amazing after it gets blocked!

Fourth, a little preemie baby hat out of a fun self-striped sock yarn from Meileinweit - it's great for leftovers!

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

And fifth, another pair of socks from stash yarn for Afghans for Afghans:

This uses some creative striping to use up some leftovers well!

You might have noticed that none of these projects are for me. Yep, I have nothing on my needles for me. Now, in the queue there is the lovely Kingscot cardigan (I'm waiting for my yarn from WEBS, they had a great sale on Ultra Alpaca Light), and I will be starting a KAL on February 1st on something for me - I'll be blogging about it in a couple of days, because I'd love for folks to join us and help bring water to village across the world by participating.

But still, I must confess: I am really bad at selfish knitting.