

Blog Post Drive-by

I've been coping with illness for more than a week - finally figured out that it is probably a sinus infection. Some knitting has happened, although surprisingly not as much as I would think - guess I really am sick.

The Kingscot sweater is looking good - here's the body (unblocked):

It always amazes me how sad a knit can look before blocking and assembling. I made it longer than the pattern - for most bodies, including even my short one, 13 inches is not necessarily a flattering length. The back and fronts were knit in one piece, because this is a sport/DK weight yarn, so I'm not really worried that it needs side-seams to hold its shape. I'm doing the sleeves now, in the round, two-at-a-time with magic loop.

The Tradisi scarf is started:

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.
<http://revknits.com>

---

although because I sick (I'm sticking to that as the reason) I had to tink a few rows and re-knit because I wasn't getting the right pattern. I'm on the second repeat now, and things are going much better!