

A Fiber Story: From Bump to Shawl

I have a fair amount of fiber in the stash, and one of my intentions for 2014 is to spin and knit more of it. I pulled out one of my favorites - a gradient wool-silk from Fiber Optics (Olive to plum colorway).

I split it into two bumps lengthwise,

And then spun each one, onto a total of four spindle shafts:

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

It was plied together (2-ply) into a lovely skein, sport-ish weight yarn, about 360 yards:

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

Then I had to find a pattern for a shawl - something simple enough to let the yarn shine through. And I found this lovely free (!) pattern called The Age of Brass and Steam Kerchief which is quite adaptable size-wise. The knitting went very quickly, and voila! Yesterday I had a blocked shawl (I didn't stretch it much - this is wool and silk knit on a Size 7 needle, and I knit loosely, so it's going to drape beautifully without much help). See?

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

See that little end there - the 6 inches or so? That's the yarn I had leftover from casting off - whew! I was really anxious that last row...

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.
<http://revknits.com>

Now it needs to be cold enough to wear it!

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

