

The Positive Thing

I'm still sick. Yesterday things looked a bit better. My Doc, though, said that this bug I have has a tendency to turn from sinus infection/brochitis into pneumonia. So, good Doc that she is, she called in an antibiotic into the pharmacy so I could pick it up anytime should I need it.

This morning I missed a 7:30 am conference call -- I was too tired and sick. Yucko. So, I caught on voice mail from work at home, talked to the church administrator about the information that we needed to trade. I had lunch, and knew that I needed to head to the pharmacy to pick up the meds, when yet another amazing knitting friend called out of the blue to see if I needed anything. Thanks, Judy! So, I got my meds without having to drive or anything.

Since I'm not otherwise productive for society, I've been knitting a lot. The cardigan is almost done (I'm so glad I was beyond the cables when I got really sick) -- it fits me at this high weight, so I think it'll work:

And because I needed a mindless, snacky kind of knit, I did this ninepatch dishrag from the Mason Dixon Knitting blog:

Revknits

Faith and life seen through the stitches we make.

<http://revknits.com>

---

